"At dusk, the giraffes come down to the dam. They do not hurry. Neither does the land that carries them."

The estate sits four hundred and eighty-nine acres along the Rift Valley floor. The land has carried its current name since 1907, when the title was first granted. The manor house was built in 1932, of cut stone from a quarry that no longer exists, and the original timber roof beams have been replaced once in ninety-four years.

The land holds water — a perennial stream, two boreholes, and a dam that has not gone dry in any recorded drought. The dam is where the resident giraffes come down at dusk, and where the zebra cross at first light. The acacia forest at the western boundary is older than the house. The wild fig tree near the main drive is older than the country.

What the estate offers is not a property. It is a stewardship — of land that has held its scale through four generations, and that asks the next owner to do the same.

What follows is the operational record of the estate. The story is on the previous page; this is the title, the water, the access. The two together are the whole property.

Eighteen kilometres from the Naivasha lakeshore. 1,890 metres above sea level. The Mau Escarpment to the west; Mount Longonot to the east.

The estate lies in the Rift Valley floor, in the highland belt that has drawn long-form residents to this region for a century. The land sits high enough that the heat releases by sunset, and low enough that the acacia forest has held for centuries.

The neighbours are estates of similar scale and similar discretion. The closest commercial centre is Naivasha town, twenty-two kilometres by road. Nairobi is ninety minutes by tarmac, fifty minutes by air. The airstrip is twelve kilometres from the gate.
